Information for Authors

China Policy Journal (CPJ) publishes original articles focusing on rigorous analysis of contemporary policy issues in Greater China. Priority will be given to articles that make strong theoretical and practical contribution base on empirical analysis, and articles that relate their conclusions broadly to regional and global contexts. We are also especially interested in systematic analysis of policy options, rigorous policy evaluation, and in-depth analysis of policy development process. Rigorous case studies and systematic surveys that challenge existing thinking on policy issues are also welcome.

Articles should be submitted electronically as an email attachment, and editorial correspondence should be addressed to Dr. James Wong, the Associate Editor of CPJ at jameskalei@ust.hk.

All submissions are subject to double-blind peer review. We will not review manuscripts that are currently under review for publication or that have been previously published.

Style Guidelines

All manuscripts should generally range from 25 to 40 pages in length (7000-12,000 words). This count includes the abstract, the manuscript text, all charts, figures, and references.

Manuscripts submitted should have no author identification in the cover sheets, text, notes, or sources. Authors should each be identified along with the contact information in the email message. Every manuscript must have an abstract and a list of key words on the abstract page. The abstract, and each figure and table must be on separate pages.

Only three descending levels of headings should be used periodically and consistently throughout the article. They should be descriptive but brief.

Tables, charts, diagrams, and other graphic materials should be used for providing necessary information or clarification of central concepts. If copyright permission is required for publishing this graphic material, it is the author's responsibility to obtain it at his/her cost.

CPJ uses in-text citations with a full list of references at the end of each article and follows the Chicago Manual of Style as primary reference source.
